Finally, New Life for Guinan’s?

After nine years of shadows, plan in place to reopen Garrison’s Landing site

By Alison Rooney

fter nine years of sitting empty, the building that housed Guinan’s Country Store for more than 50 years before it closed in 2008 may reopen soon as a café operated by Fresh Company.

Garrison Station Plaza, which owns the structure, hopes to see the building’s ground floor under the management of Garrison’s Shelley Boris, who co-owns and is creative director and executive chef for Fresh Company caterers, which also runs the café at Storm King Art Center. The upper floor would house two apartments.

To restore the building, the nonprofit Garrison’s Landing Association is soliciting tax-deductible donations and so far has raised more than $250,000, or about half what is needed.

Garrison Station Plaza has a building permit in hand for what it hopes will be the final stages of arranging financing.

The many people who visit Garrison’s Landing and are charmed by its historic character and nestled-by-the-river ambience may be surprised to learn how different part of it looked as recently as the 1960s. Many of its buildings were constructed in the 1850s as tenant housing and have since been restored. The parcel of land running adjacent to the Metro-North tracks

Dig Deeper in 2017

By Pamela Doan

The challenge of a new administration in Washington that says it wants to gut environmental protections, denies the science of climate change and has the power to enact dangerous and devastating policies puts the idea of “resolutions for the garden” in a new light for me. The idea of putting around raising tomatoes, composting and planting flowers seems less than enough to counter the impact. Pollinator oases of native plants aren’t going to save the food system when there may not be an Environmental Protection Agency empowered to regulate the chemicals used to spray crops. I could plant my yard with milkweed and the monarch butterfly may still go extinct. Without funding, the research needed to track the impact of climate events will stop and we won’t have data to understand what’s occurring.

But I can’t stop what I’ve started. Gardening involves accepting that you can nourish the soil and plant the seed but nature has its own plan. The bush gets taller than you thought it would and starts shading the perennials. The deer eat your deer-resistant plants. A viburnum leaf beetle arrives and defoliates your cranberry bush overnight. The rhythm of gardening is to live with setbacks and keep trying because you love seeing things grow.

So this is a year to dig deeper. Dig in and dig out, plant where nothing grows, and create a space for new things to flourish and be nourished even when nothing else seems right. Move those sun seekers and think about how to create a plant community that can live together.

Instead of outlining my usual New Year’s resolutions for gardening, I went bigger.

What I can do in my yard

Understand more about ecology. Forest surrounds me. A stream runs through it and sometime in the past, a dam was built to form a pond where frogs and crayfish live and ducks pass through in the spring. There are seasonal marshes in the woods and up above the house there’s an open field that was grass until we decided mowing it was a waste of time and resources. Around the house, there are native plant flowerbeds that I planted by reclaiming turf from invasive Japanese barberry. Each year I’m delighted to see more bees and butterflies. I’m going to learn more about how these distinct features interact and how to better support them.

What to do in the community

Volunteer. I’ve been a Master Gardener for four years and enjoy teaching about gardening, especially as it relates to adapting to climate change and shrinking your carbon footprint. Using the networks and resources from the Cornell Cooperative Extension, I can do more on this subject this year.

Find a community project. Philipstown does pretty well in this area. The schools have gardens and environmental education. CSAs are popular. The farmers’ markets are crowded. Managing water wisely is going to become more important, though, and as a community, there are things we can do better. I don’t have a plan yet but more to think about.

What to do in New York

Connect with local legislators. It’s time for big, bold action. On a state level, there are many ways we can make progress in reducing New Yorkers’ carbon emissions. There are elected leaders who seem to understand that and they need to hear that it’s a top issue. I don’t love political work but sitting out the game isn’t an option. Switching to renewable energy is a priority but it may not be supported on a federal level.

What to do nationally

National organizations are critical to large-scale action and legislative challenges. Donate, get action alerts, sign petitions and show up to protest. The Standing Rock Water Protectors are an inspiration for the kind of organizing that needs to be done. They won that battle, at least for now.
Notes from the Haldane School Board

By Lily Gordon

A s of two weeks ago, a plaque inscribed with the word inclusive hangs on the door of a two-stall restroom at Haldane High School.

“Our Identity Club recently implemented an all-inclusive bathroom, which is a huge step within the LGBTQ community,” said Miranda Musso, Haldane’s student body vice president. “It’s a really great, positive step for us.”

While the restroom has been unofficially open since before Peter Carucci became principal this year, he gladly agreed to order the sign after the Identity Club requested it at the end of September.

The Garrison School also has an all-gender restroom. James J. O’Neill High School, which many Garrison students attend, does not; students are welcome to use the restroom of the gender with which they identify, as well as the nurse’s private washroom, according to Superintendent Frank Sheboy. The Beacon City School District did not return a message asking about its policies.

In other business...

• A maintenance employee noticed smoke rising from the roof of Haldane Elementary/Middle School earlier this month, and staff identified a DC connector between solar panels as the source. After putting out the small fire and disconnecting the piece, the district hired forensic engineers to investigate the problem. A mechanical issue was identified and the system was shut down until repairs can be made.

• The Haldane High School volleyball, boys’ soccer, girls’ soccer, boys’ cross country, girls’ cross country and tennis teams were nominated as New York State scholar-athlete teams, meaning 75 percent of each team’s members held a GPA of 90 or above.

• The Haldane chorus, the Blue Notes, will perform the national anthem at the New York Mets game against the Atlanta Braves at Turner Field in Atlanta at 7:10 p.m. on April 22.

• The Jan. 3 board meeting was cancelled; the next meeting will be Jan. 17.

Previous meetings (staff reports)

Dec. 6

• The board discussed capital projects proposed for the 2016-17 school year, including repair of windows in the elementary school, replacing or repairing the 26-year-old bleachers in the gymnasium (estimated to be about $30,000 for repair and $67,000 to replace) and updating the elementary school bathrooms, which date to 1980 (costing about $150,000 each for a total renovation, although other options could be considered).

Nov. 15

• The board thanked Damian McDonald for the donation of ETC ColorSource LED Cyclorama fixtures, valued at about $11,000, for the projection booth in the school auditorium.

• Tom Powers, a former longtime head basketball coach at Beacon High School, was appointed the boys’ junior varsity basketball coach for a stipend of $3,545.

• The board adopted a new policy regarding head lice, which states that “when a student is identified with live head lice, he or she shall be referred to the nurse’s office and the parents will be notified and will be provided with instructions regarding the treatment of head lice. The student will be readmitted to school the following day, provided that appropriate treatment has been given and no evidence of live lice is found upon examination by the school nurse. In recognition of the fact that the management of head lice should not substantially disrupt the education process, the school district does not have a ‘no-nit’ policy’ that bars students with nits (lice eggshells that can be time-consuming to remove) from returning to school.

• The board approved the appointment of Meghan Crowe as full-time athletic trainer.

Oct. 18

• The board observed a moment of silence for former Garrison resident and Haldane student Robert Schartner, who died on Oct. 9 at age 21 after being struck by a drunk driver in White Plains. He was attending Manhattanville College, where he played lacrosse.

• Athletic Director Chris Salumn made a presentation on concussion management to the board, noting that changes to the district’s policy would include baseline testing of all athletes in grades 7 to 12. If an athlete sustains a concussion, this baseline, updated every two years, will be used to determine when he or she can be cleared to return to play. In a letter later shared with the board, former school nurse Candy Zgolinski noted that she and former athletic director Tom Cuningham had developed a concussion protocol for the district six years earlier, including baseline testing, and she was surprised to learn that the previous program was no longer in place. She suggested that the baseline testing be given to all students at Haldane, adding that concussions can occur outside of sports.

Guillaro vs. Cold Spring

A blind person could have seen this legal claim coming from Butterfield developer Paul Guillaro (“Butterfield Developer Wants $2.5 Million from Village,” Dec. 23). The actions of Mayor Dave Merandy, former village Trustee Stephanie Hawkins and Planning Board Chair Matt Franciscio have put the village at risk. The interesting part to me is that if the court finds that they violated the village code and rules or state statutes, the error and omissions policy of the insurance is not obligated to cover it and Guillaro can recover the damages from them personally. There are a number of people who should be looking over their shoulders.

I was a member of the Village Board for 10 years and a previous board got into this jam and the personal liability issue was put forth by the insurance company. I can’t wait to watch this unfold.

Tom Valentine, Cold Spring

Prediction: this lawsuit will not cost the taxpayers a dime. It will wind through the courts for a while, eventually leading to a dismissal or flat-out verdict in the village’s favor, and the developer will be required to pick up the costs.

As much as some stakeholders in this village would prefer that we treat big-moneyed interests like conquering heroes, I am of the more realistic mind that the governing boards were performing exactly to their intent: to ensure the maximum benefit for the maximum number of people. God forbid that the boards didn’t just take the developer’s word for it that this project would be beneficial but actually made him prove it. For shame! He has money! His interests must certainly be benevolent and we must be nothing but grateful that he wanted to build a project that will forever alter the landscape and texture of the village.

A village of this size, with such limited resources and opportunities, should not just embrace every project and idea that comes down the pike, as much as some are so foolhardy to quickly do. The process this project went through, while long, was absolutely appropriate to the scope of the endeavor. To think something of this magnitude should be rubber-stamped (which it absolutely was for a good long time under a previous Planning Board chair) willfully ignores the context of what it is to be part of this village.

I should know. I had (still have) a long-term project on my home that was, to put it mildly, subject to an arduous back and forth with the Historic District Review Board. And you know what? As long as it was, and as expensive as it became, it was the right thing to do. The final design is better, the input and cooperation with the board was invaluable, and all in all, that’s what being a good neighbor is.

The developer should man up and move his project along, and stop rehearsing a process that he might not agree with but was absolutely necessary.

Christopher Daly, Cold Spring

The insolence, arrogance and total effort to fair play of the actions of Merandy and his band of not-so-merry followers has led to this. Bravo, I say, to Guillaro, the developer of the Butterfield Follies Project, for bringing it. It has been a long time coming.

Guillaro has my total support. Obviously, the stakes are much higher now, and the arena more unforgiving in histrionics and grandstanding, taking away one of the defendant’s and his followers’ favorite tactics. I imagine this trial will move swiftly, not nearly the “drag out, and drag-out-some-more motions” the Butterfield detractors have used until now. The court that the defendants will soon find themselves in will not tolerate what is usually on display, and thank God for that! The defendants will need to do a 360 so they look straight ahead at the orchestra, because it is time for them to face the music.

State Pumps Millions in Development Dollars into Region

Dennings Point improvements among projects funded

By Jeff Simms

A number of agencies in the Highlands have received substantial state grants for projects beginning and continuing into 2017. The money comes from the state Regional Economic Development Councils (EDC), which were established in 2011 to develop plans tailored to the strengths of each region.

Among the projects funded are plans to transform portions of Dennings Point in Beacon into a more visitor-friendly park as well as a downtown revitalization initiative by the city and Hudson Valley Pattern for Progress.

The $500,000 Dennings Point grant, awarded to the Beacon Institute for Rivers and Estuaries, will be used to supplement efforts already underway to improve access to and improve facilities at the popular hiking spot just south of the Beacon Metro-North station. Efforts include a rehab of the bridge that leads into Dennings Point, the partial conversion of a factory building into on-site parking, a solar energy array on the factory roof and a large pavilion fashioned from the factory building and located on the shores of Fishkill Creek bay.

The bulk of the projects are scheduled to begin in September 2017, after the bridge is re-opened. According to the nonprofit Beacon Institute, the factory improvement project will complement other work at Dennings Point, including bald eagle viewing stations built on the shoreline last year and extensive trail improvements. Trail work is slated to begin in September and will improve ADA accessibility on the riverside path along the length of the point.

Current funding for these projects comes from the New York Power Authority and the state parks department. The EDC grant provides the final funding needed to complete them.

This is sour grapes from a developer who is unaccustomed to public officials acting in the best interests of a community instead of the politically connected, like him. This is democracy in action here in Cold Spring and he doesn’t like it. Now the Butterfield developer has declared war on the residents and taxpayers of Cold Spring, and is trying to extort a corporate welfare payment of $2.5 million for profit he thinks he’s somehow entitled to.

Shale formations in North Dakota, have the highest vapor pressures and thus pose a greater threat than other fuels. It noted the Quebec accident involved a train carrying oil with a PSI above 9.

In a statement, Schneiderman said he welcomed the DOT initiative, calling it “a long-overdue first step towards reducing the danger to residents in harm’s way of oil trains in New York and across the country.”

Hayley Carlock, director of environmental advocacy for Scenic Hudson, said the Poughkeepsie-based organization intends to submit comments. “We believe it is certainly a step in the right direction to adopt such limits, but remains to be seen how stringent the ultimate rule will be,” she said.

In his petition to DOT, filed in December 2015, Schneiderman pointed out that no national limit on vapor pressure exists for train shipments. Two years ago, after the New York State departments of Transportation and Environmental Conservation raised concerns about bomb-train hazards, North Dakota mandated that oil producers make Bakken crude safer before shipment by keeping vapor pressure to 13.7 PSI or less.

The docket number for the proposed rulemaking is PHMSA-2016-0077, and the petition will be available at regulations.gov.

Putnam, Westchester, Ulster and Orange counties. Beacon, together with Hudson Valley Pattern, received $375,000 to conduct a study on how to retain and attract businesses; city officials hope to leverage the grant for additional economic development funding.

Research conducted with the grant will be used to create a blueprint for how Beacon stakeholders want the city to look in 10 years — part of a series of profiles to be drawn up for urban centers in the Hudson Valley. The goal is to better prepare cities for private investment as well as future state and federal government funding opportunities.

Other grants include $300,000 for an expansion of Fishkill Farms orchards and construction of a craft cider facility, tasting room and event space. The Village of Brewster, together with Putnam County, received $2 million to begin the first phase of a village revitalization plan, and KAS Spirits in Mahopac received $5,000 to increase production of its spiced honey liquor.

"Zep" to Step Down

Longtime Beacon highway chief retires Jan. 14

By Jeff Simms

Anthony “Zep” Thomaselli didn’t sleep while this article was being written. Instead, monitored the weather, waiting for a Thursday morning snowstorm predicted to bring three to four inches to Beacon.

When a storm hits, the city has 59 miles of roads that must be cleared. A 23-year Beacon employee and lifelong resident, Thomaselli will retire as the city’s highway superintendent on Jan. 14. Until then, just like every winter, he’ll get little sleep.

Walking through the department’s expansive new headquarters, Thomaselli says he intended to retire a year ago but stayed on to see the 28,000-square foot building open this fall. A substantial upgrade over the department’s Churchill Street facility, the building — located off Matteawan Drive near Beacon High School — has a carpenter’s shop, the city’s street-sign shop and a massive mechanic’s bay.

It’s there that Beacon’s trucks are readied for snow and ice, but that’s far from all that Zep — so named as a child, he says, for having “a head like a zepplin” — oversees. From Main Street decorations to filling in as school crossing guards or collecting bagged leaves from curbside, it’s hard to quantify all that the highway department does, but if it stopped, you’d notice.

Thomaselli, 63, began working at age 14 as a dishwasher and later a short-order cook at the Main Street restaurant now known as Quinn’s. A 1971 graduate of Beacon High, he then worked in construction before buying Zep’s Place (now Dogwood) with Randy Casale, Beacon’s mayor.

“We’ve been friends since I was 10,” said Casale, who was the highway superintendent for 22 years, from 1980 to 2002. “We’re losing a dedicated public servant who always treated our constituents with respect.”

The duo operated Zep’s Place from 1976 to 1980 while Casale worked for the city and Thomaselli was employed as a contractor. In 1993, at Casale’s suggestion, Thomaselli started with the highway department and a decade later became its chief.

“I remember on a Sunday afternoon in the summer, you could roll a bowling ball down Main Street and you wouldn’t hit a car,” he recalled. “Now, it’s amazing. Beacon is cleaned up. It’s fun to see it so vibrant.”

In addition to maintenance of streets and signs, the highway department oversees city parks and the upkeep of City Hall and other public buildings. It also inspects and repairs more than 800 storm basins.

Thomaselli said the blizzard of March 2011 stands out as one of the city’s most difficult in recent memory. “Cars were getting stuck on flat ground,” he said. “We had almost 36 inches, and the snow built up so fast.”

Thomaselli and his crews worked non-stop for days to dig the city out. “There’s nobody around that clears the streets like the city of Beacon,” Casale said.

A new highway superintendent has not been named, but Casale said an announcement is imminent. Meanwhile, Thomaselli will continue part-time as a consultant to help his replacement get adjusted. He has some plans to travel but says he will likely keep working, perhaps in construction again. “If I’m not out of the house early, I get lazy,” he said. “I don’t want to do that.”

The Beacon Bagel Rolls On
Manager to take over popular business
By Brian PJ Cronin

There’s going to be something different about your first bagel of 2017, although you probably won’t notice it. As of Jan. 1, the Beacon Bagel will be under new, although familiar, ownership.

“It’s time,” said Art Burns, who founded the popular take-out with his wife Anik in the summer of 2009 on the east end of Main Street. “It’s been a long, hard, seven years. The bulk of those seven years has been in the form of 90-hour weeks and 18-hour days. But it’s in a good place right now, and we’re able to do this, so why not?”

Manager Candace Lanza will take over as the owner in the new year. “She’s been running the place on her own for the past nine months anyway,” said Burns, who has been spending less time behind the counter.

When Art and Anik decided to sell the business six months ago, they planned to give Lanza a raise to entice her to stay. “That way, she’d be part of the package,” said Burns. “I’d be able to tell whoever was buying the business that it comes with this amazing manager. But when I brought it up to her, she said ‘Well, what if I wanted to buy it?’”

Lanza, who said her only previous culinary experience was a stint in the kitchen at Chuck E. Cheese’s (“although I guess that doesn’t really count”), joined the Beacon Bagel two years ago and quickly acclimated to the shop’s frenetic pace, with its hot line, cold line, coffee line and gluten-free line, plus more than 60 sandwiches on a rotating roster of a dozen bagels, as well as breakfast burritos and salads.

As for Art and Anik, they’ll be spending the first half of 2017 taking a break and concentrating on their two children. But Art said they’ll also be tinkering with an idea. All he would allow is that it will be food-related and might require a truck. “But it won’t involve bagels,” he said. “I gotta get away from bagels for a little while.”

We asked ourselves what we were going to do next, and then realized that we had been walking around here for two years trying to find a decent bagel.” Burns recalled.

The couple churned out bagels that hit the platonic ideal of what a New York City bagel should be: Crusty, chewy and substantial. Art Burns grew up around the corner from the original Ess-a-Bagel on 21st Street, which he considered the gold standard until it closed in 2015 due to rising rents. He spent the first winter begging people to come in to the Beacon Bagel but once the word got out among other New York City ex-pats, the lines began to form. By the time the Roundhouse and the Towne Crier opened nearby a few years later, the couple felt the business was over the hump.

Art Burns said his concern now for Beacon is that rising rents will push local businesses out. But bagel fans needn’t worry: The couple signed a 10-year lease last year, which will transfer to Lanza.

The new owner said she doesn’t plan dramatic changes, although she is finalizing an app that will allow customers to order online and join a loyalty program. She’d also like to bring back deliveries.

Main Street Jewel Ends Run

After 18 years, Momminia to close Jan. 1
By Michael Turton

After doing business on Cold Spring’s Main Street for 18 years, Momminia Avante Garde Jewelry will close its doors for the last time at 5 p.m. on Sunday, Jan. 1, with everything in stock marked down 50 percent. Steve Goodrich and his wife Marlene, who died in October, opened the shop in March 1998.

“Her spirit really was this store,” Goodrich said. Longtime employee Monica Singh echoed those feelings. “It’s not the same without Marlene,” she said.

“But we’ve had a good, long run.”

Goodrich said he is retiring but will probably sell at a few gem shows “just for fun.” He admitted he found some customers amusing. “People love coming here from the city because they consider it ‘the country,’” he said. “Anything that is not all buildings is the country.” For some, he marveled, “their idea of camping is coming here by train and staying at an Airbnb!”

Snow Angel
Beacon resident helps teens conquer mountains

By Alison Rooney

Danny Hairston has a simple message for middle schoolers: When you fall, get back up.

Hairston is the founder and director of the Beacon-based nonprofit SHRED, which stands for Snowboarders & Skaters Helping Reimagine Education. (Shred is slang for snowboarding.) He says he hopes to engage and re-engage at-risk teenagers with the mantra of fear, failure, flow — more familiar, perhaps, as try, fail, persevere — to help those who lack resources to gain a foothold and fly.

As the snow starts sticking, the Windham Mountain Resort is partnering with SHRED for the second year, offering access, equipment and instruction to teenagers who normally would not have the means to participate.

The program has two components, Hairston says: snow and arts. Founded in 2013, SHRED has its roots in the non-snowboarding capital of Brooklyn, where Hairston worked as a youth program supervisor. A co-worker convinced him to come along as a chaperone on a trip to Vermont sponsored by Burton Snowboards' Chill Foundation, which builds resiliency in teens through challenging physical activities.

“I had never been exposed to snowboarding,” says Hairston, who was 35 at the time. “I never saw such a quick change in kids.”

He began volunteering for the Chill Foundation and ended up moving to Burlington, Vermont, to do development and marketing for Burton. Eventually he returned to New York City before landing in Beacon and creating and supervising afterschool programs for the Poughkeepsie School District. Earlier this year, a group of 10 students from Poughkeepsie middle schools became test pilots for SHRED. The experiment was a success (nine of the 10 participants now snowboard on intermediate trails) and this year a group has been recruited from the Boys & Girls Club of Newburgh, where Hairston is program director.

SHRED is designed for teenagers who have never been on a snow-packed mountain. “It’s an expensive sport — lift tickets cost $70 to $90 and the equipment isn't cheap,” he says. Besides Windham, Shred is slang for snowboarding.}

A Whovian Wish Fulfilled
Beacon restaurant hosts 11-year-old Dr. Who fan

By Alison Rooney

A wish came true in Beacon on Dec. 23 for an 11-year-old from Florida who may be the most dedicated fan of the British television series Dr. Who in the universe.

The Hudson Valley chapter of the Make-a-Wish Foundation brought Collin Cash, who is in remission from Burkitt's lymphoma B-cell leukemia, to the Pandorica Restaurant for a Dr. Who-themed party complete with live characters played by other fans. The Doctor himself showed up in various incarnations, along with his nemeses.

Collin, who lives in Port St. Lucie, had his sights set on a trip to the U.K. to visit the Doctor, Experience, an attraction in Cardiff, Wales, but his family thought an overseas trip might be pushing it. Collin then read about Pandorica, a themed restaurant at 165 Main St. that is devoted to the show. The South Florida chapter of Make-a-Wish, one of 62 in the U.S., contacted Megan Laurelli, wish coordinator for the Hudson Valley chapter, who got in touch with Shirley Hot, the restaurant's owner.

"First I cried," Hot recalled, after hearing about Collin's condition and his wish. "Then I started thinking that for a kid coming from Florida, just coming to Pandorica is not enough." She reached out to her regulars, including members of a newly formed Dr. Who Club in Connecticut that already has more than 200 members, and asked for help. "There are people here from Massachusetts, New Jersey and Long Island — generous spirits," she said.

Hot also called a number of Beacon stores, including Clutter, Play, Dream in Plastic and Notions and Potions, that donated games and coloring books. Soon after, the Dutchess County Legislature declared Dec. (Continued on Page 14)
While charitable donations can be made year-round to support critically important community resources, you have until Dec. 31 to contribute to your favorite nonprofit and still receive a deduction on your 2016 taxes. Checks must be mailed by 1 p.m. in Beacon and noon in Cold Spring and Garrison, when the counters close, because the envelope must be postmarked that day. Credit card payments, however, can be processed up until midnight. Don’t worry: if you’re reading this in 2017, you’ll be way ahead of the game for next year’s return.

SHRED gets support from Sandbox Helmets, Ski Haus in Wappingers Falls, Orange County Snowboards in Goshen and Out of Bounds in New Jersey, as well as brands such as Burton, Capita, 32 Boots and Union Binding.

The long-term goal, he says, is to partner with schools, recreation departments, snow/skate companies, mountains and brands to develop apprenticeship programs for teenagers who are interested in pursuing non-traditional careers such as working at a ski resort or for a snowboard company. “We tell the kids that every snowboard company needs an attorney, accountant, human resources staff, as well as retail staff,” he says.

“We’re also trying to implement a science and engineering project at Burton involving testing the mechanisms of all their products: what are the components of the snowboard that make it do the things it does?”

SHRED’s arts program includes instruction in videography, photography, graphic design and motion graphics. At the Boys & Girls Club in Newburgh, the goal is for the 12 participants to have a working knowledge of Adobe Works Suite software by the time they enter high school. “We want to use the snow and skateboarding culture to reimagine the education process, with them engaged in learning skills which they can then take back into the classrooms, applying them to math, social studies” and other disciplines, Hairston explains.

Besides fundraisers, SHRED has an event at Two-Way Brewery in Beacon on the second Friday of each month and at Newburgh Brewery on the third Thursday. To donate, visit shredfoundation.org or send a check to SHRED Foundation, 94 Prospect St., Beacon, NY 12508.
23 to be “Collin’s Dr. Who Day.”

Collin was diagnosed in July 2015 and underwent six months of chemotherapy to battle the cancer, which originates in the cells of the immune system. Ninety percent of children are cured, and Collin has been in remission for a year. (Make-a-Wish notes that while the children it serves have life-threatening conditions, it isn’t providing “last wishes.” The Hudson Valley chapter, which is based in Tarrytown and handles requests in Dutchess, Putnam and six other counties, typically has about 110 requests in progress.)

On the big day, Pandorica was decked out with Whovian accessories, including a buffet with Dr. Who favorites such as fish fingers and custard. An hour before Collin arrived, Pandorica was packed with “cosplayers,” fans almost as dedicated as Collin, draped in both costume and attitude.

There were almost as many Dr. Who players as there have been actors in the ever-changing show, which first aired in 1963, ran through 1989, and was revived in 2005. Dr. Who is a spacefaring and time-travelling humanoid alien who, accompanied by companions, combats a variety of foes while saving civilizations and helping those in need.

Twelve actors have headlined the series, each taking over after the previous Dr. Who suffers a severe injury that requires him to regenerate into a new body and being — a device which was invented upon the departure of the first actor.

Dustin Hausner, an early arrival to Collin’s party, came as the seventh Dr. Who, resplendent in a boater hat, plaid pants, white jacket and, most crucial, a vest with a question mark pattern and an umbrella with a similar handle. Hausner, a graduate student at Columbia studying negotiation and conflict resolution, described No. 7 as “very mysterious. My theory is that he is happy, yes, but he also has a bit of sadness about him.”

Hausner said that many of the cosplayers know each other from science-fiction conventions and other events. “We’re all here for the opportunity to help a kid have some fun,” he said. Patrick Fenton, depicting No. 8, likewise said he came “to make someone’s day.”

Into each hero’s life, villains must enter. Pandorica had two. Tom Hoppe, who portrayed Cyberman, who looked like the Tin Man crossed with something meaner, is a member of COS ‘N Effect, a group that provides characters for charities such as Make-a-Wish. Kara Sternquist was Missy, who insisted she was no everyday Dr. Who nemesis but, in fact, an arch-nemesis.

Each of these characters, along with others, lined up beside a “red carpet” entrance created with crowd-control barriers outside of Pandorica as a white limousine containing Collin, his parents Jonathan and Jennifer, and his twin sister Kendall arrived. Collin seemed excited but not overly intimidated, greeting the smiling, applauding crowd, and shaking hands.

Saving Ethel Rosenberg

military base in Los Alamos, New Mexico, and said she had typed up notes he had given Julius about the atomic bomb, making her an active participant in the conspiracy. In exchange for his testimony, Greenglass was given a 10-year prison term and his wife Ruth was freed.

The Rosenbergs’ convictions divided the nation, with protesters proclaiming their innocence and others clamoring for their deaths. Despite pleas for clemency from Pope Pius XII and Albert Einstein, Julius Rosenberg was executed, followed by Ethel, at sundown on June 19, 1953. Left orphans, Michael and Robert Rosenberg took on the name of the family that adopted them.

This month, the brothers returned to the northwest gate of the White House with another letter and a petition with more than 40,000 signatures addressed to President Obama. Based on years of mounting evidence that their mother was not involved in the conspiracy, including the unsealing in 2015 of David Greenglass’ grand jury testimony in which he made no mention of his sister, the brothers are fighting for their mother to be posthumously exonerated.

“The FBI started releasing stuff about the case back in 1975, and that gave us hints,” Meerepol said. But the grand jury material was crucial, he said, because it forms “the official basis of the government’s indictment.”

In 2001, in an interview with 60 Minutes, Greenglass, who died in 2014, said he had manufactured his sister’s involvement after being pressured by the prosecutor, 24-year-old Roy Cohn (who, made famous by the trial, became chief counsel to Sen. Joseph McCarthy). He said Cohn hoped Julius Rosenberg would confess to spare his wife’s life.

“The government didn’t care if she was guilty,” says Michael Meerepol now. “She was just a lever to get to my father. But the bluff didn’t work. That’s the saddest thing about this.”

In 2008, a co-conspirator in the case, Morton Sobell, who served 18 years in prison but maintained his innocence, said he was in fact guilty of spying, as was Julius Rosenberg. Of Ethel, he said: “She knew what he was doing. But what was she guilty of? Of being Julius’ wife.”

When the grand jury testimony was unsealed, and after a team from the Seton Hall University School of Law this month concluded the evidence against Ethel was “threadbare,” the Meerepol brothers believed they had the momentum to push for their mother’s exoneration before Obama leaves office on Jan. 20.

Even if the president does pardon her, Michael Meerepol said he understands not everyone will be convinced.

“The usual suspects will come out and say Obama was wrong,” he said. “But hopefully, it would generate interest. The people who already study this, the people who read, people who take the trouble, they already know she should not have been executed. But for the president to say it, that will get a whole lot of other people to say ‘Hey, let’s check this out.' ”

A letter written by Ethel Rosenberg to her sons on June 19, 1953, hours before she and her husband were executed at Sing Sing prison in Ossining.

Dearest Sweethearts, my most precious children,

Only this morning it looked like we might be together again after all. Now that this cannot be, I want so much for you to know all that I have come to know. Unfortunately, I may write only a few simple words; the rest your own lives must teach you, even as mine taught me.

At first, of course, you will grieve bitterly for us, but you will not grieve alone. That is our consolation and it must eventually be yours.

Eventually, too, you must come to believe that life is worth the living. Be comforted that even now, with the end of ours slowly approaching, that we know this with a conviction that defeats the execution.

Your lives must teach you, too, that good cannot really flourish in the midst of evil; that freedom and all the things that go to make up a truly satisfying and worthwhile life cannot really flourish in the midst of evil; that life is worth the living. Be comforted for us, but you will not grieve alone. That we are together again after all. Now that we are in God’s hands, we shall be together again forever.

A Mother’s Last Letter

Michael Rosenberg around 1942

Ethel and Julius Rosenberg around 1942

The brothers see their mother’s death as a cautionary tale about the abuse of power. “These are the kinds of things that governments can do,” Michael Meerepol said, “especially in trying times, when there’s a lot of emotion and a lot of fear.”

In the fiery rhetoric of Donald Trump, who was once advised by Roy Cohn, he hears echoes of the Red Scare. “Governments have a habit of being authoritarian when they know they’re right,” Meerepol said. “Nobody is more sure he’s right than the president-elect.”

Both Meerepols have remained active in public life since the 1970s. Robert founded the Rosenberg Fund For Children (rfc.org), which supports the children of political activists. One of his daughters is an executive director, and another daughter is preparing to argue a case before the U.S. Supreme Court on behalf of immigrants who were deported after 9/11. Michael’s daughter Ivy Meerepol, who lives in Cold Spring, in 2004 made a critically acclaimed documentary Heir to an Execution about her grandparents.

Michael Meerepol said he learned an important lesson from his mother’s life and death: Never back down when you know you’re right. “If you care about this country, you have a responsibility to be in it,” he said. “There are some pretty trying times ahead, but you have to be in the arena.”

Once served as home to Garrison’s post office, library and firehouse. It includes the 1892 railway depot (now the Philipstown Depot Theatre) and the Garrison Art Center (formerly Forson’s general store) and the responsibility of being on the National Register of Historic Places.

Its maintenance is overseen by two entities: the nonprofit Landing Association and the for-profit Garrison Station Plaza. The association was formed in 1962 by residents to purchase from New York Central Railroad the railroad building and the road leading to it (they later acquired the marina area). Garrison Station Plaza was formed in 1966 to purchase land and buildings on the waterfront at Garrison from the Belcher Realty Co., as part of general plans to restore the neighborhood.

At the time the buildings were acquired by Garrison Station Plaza, the occupants included two tenants who are still there: the Prescott family and the Garrison Art Center. A third longtime tenant was Guinan’s.

The rents collected by Garrison Station Plaza cover maintenance and other expenses. The Plaza has never generated a profit, and many stakeholders have donated their shares to the Landing Association, making it the majority owner of Garrison Station Plaza (which causes much confusion). Many in the community are unaware that the restoration, care and upkeep of the area such as plowing, litter cleanups, sidewalk maintenance, lawn mowing, flower planting, erosion protection and insurance coverage come not from the Town of Philipstown but from donations.

Board members say this lack of consistent funding has stalled the development of another food establishment at the former Guinan’s site.

Garrison’s Landing, like the hamlet of Garrison, was named for Harry Garrison, who ran a ferry established in 1821 to West Point. It was a primary means of getting to the military academy until the construction of the Bear Mountain Bridge in 1929. After being filled in, the slips and the hulks of several ferries became the picturesque park at the heart of the Landing.

When parts of Hello Dolly were filmed at the landing in 1968, the 20th Century Fox crew built the gazebo and repainted several facades, investing about $60,000. That exterior restoration jump-started attention to the interior, which needed insulation, heating repairs and water systems. All of this became the focus of Garrison Station Plaza.

Much of the landing was owned by the Belcher family, descendants of Henry White Belcher, owner of the Garrison and West Point Ferry Co. The Belcher family, headed by Col. Taylor Belcher, also owned the Garrison Coal Co. As recently as the late 1950s, the area nearest to the coal company, at the north end of the landing, was filled with the remnants of a once-thriving industry, including shacks and sheds on the promontory leading out from the 1840s Golden Eagle building, once known as the Garrison Hotel.

Latter-day Belcher family members were involved with both organizations and their efforts, with Taylor Belcher Jr. (Toby), who at one time served as U.S. ambassador to Cypress and to Peru, serving as president of each organization for a period.

Today the Landing Association rents the former depot to Philipstown Performing Arts through the Town of Philipstown, and the 1950 marina — once home to a seaplane base and flying school operated by Don Yannitelli Sr. — to the Garrison Yacht Club. Garrison Station Plaza, said that in some instances, rents for properties used by the community have been kept at below-market rates.

“The business allows us to keep up the appearance of the landing,” he explained. “We don’t make money on the rent, but we do have expenses, mortgage payments and taxes to deal with, and the rent allows us to maintain things.”

The Landing Association’s 2016 donation appeal letter highlighted the formidable work needed at No. 7 Garrison’s Landing, (the former Guinan’s) namely “new septic, flood-proofing and extensive interior and exterior structural refurbishment.”

Some Landing Association board members believe there is a misconception of its role, particularly in relation to the Guinan’s site. “People think we are asking for funding for an upmarket restaurant business, but that’s not at all the case,” said Margaret O’Sullivan. “It’s important to remember that none of the cost of this is included in local taxes — in fact we pay tens of thousands of dollars in local taxes. We’re doing our best to raise the money necessary to rejuvenate the south end of the landing and revitalize the area, which will then help out the yacht club, the theater and the art center. Really, everyone who visits the landing will benefit.”

Some residents have expressed concern that making the landing too appealing will cause it to be overrun with visitors, as has happened with sites such as Breakneck Ridge and Indian Brook Falls. But board members say they are happy to see the park enjoyed as a “private property, open to the public.” Said Hofmann, the board president: “Visitors coming and bringing their chairs out by the river on a Sunday, people launching kayaks from the landing — we welcome all of that.”
